Testo in italiano:

Uno degli strumenti per prevenire o minimizzare l'entità degli scarti alimentari a livello domestico è una corretta identificazione della data entro la quale l'alimento deve essere consumato. Mentre esistono linee guida per l'apposizione di date di scadenza su alimenti che presentano rischi igienico-sanitari durante la conservazione, al momento non esistono indicazioni per alimenti a lunga conservazione che perdono progressivamente attributi di qualità nel tempo e per i quali è prevista, in etichettatura, l'apposizione del termine minimo di conservazione (TMC, in inglese BBD - Best Before Date). La principale causa di scadimento qualitativo di questi prodotti è rappresentata dalle reazioni di ossidazione, soprattutto a carico della frazione lipidica. Gli effetti di queste reazioni alterative risultano facilmente percepibili da parte dei consumatori che vengono indotti a rifiutare il prodotto ed eliminarlo. Una identificazione non corretta del TMC è, dunque, causa di spreco alimentare. L'obiettivo dell'attività di ricerca di seguito descritta è quello di sviluppare un approccio scientifico per determinare in modo corretto il termine minimo di conservazione di alimenti soggetti ad ossidazione. Questa ricerca si inquadra nel piano di un più ampio progetto PRIN 2022 "Fighting the waste of food undergoing oxidation through the development of a scientific-based approach for date marking" nell'ambito del quale il/la giovane ricercatore/trice da reclutare sarà attivamente coinvolto/a.

La ricerca si articolerà come segue:

▪ Fase 1: Identificazione dei prodotti alimentari ad alto rischio di ossidazione durante la conservazione

Questa fase preliminare mira a identificare, su basi razionali, le categorie di alimenti maggiormente prone a reazioni di ossidazione durante la conservazione. A tal fine verrà adottato un approccio di risk assessment rivolto a categorie di alimenti soggetti a TMC, quali alimenti shelf stable (bevande, bevande alcoliche e fermentate, prodotti da forno, alimenti essiccati e ingredienti, prodotti da forno, cereali e snack, oli e grassi) e alimenti surgelati (pesce, carne o verdure crude; prodotti pronti all'uso o da riscaldare). A tale scopo verrà adottata la seguente procedura: a) Identificazione di tutti gli eventi di alterazione potenziali che potrebbero influire negativamente sulla qualità di un prodotto selezionato; b) Valutazione del rischio di insorgenza di eventi di alterazione diversi durante la conservazione da cui ottenere la probabilità che si verifichino ossidazioni. Tali valutazioni dovranno tenere in considerazione le caratteristiche dell'alimento, la sua storia tecnologica e la natura del packaging. I risultati permetteranno di identificare le categorie di alimenti ad alto rischio di ossidazione.

▪ Fase 2: Monitoraggio dei fenomeni ossidativi di alimenti confezionati durante la conservazione

Tra le categorie di alimenti identificate nella fase 1, verranno selezionati alcuni alimenti come prodotti target da considerare per ulteriori attività di ricerca. L'obiettivo di questa fase sarà quello di studiare l'evoluzione di fenomeni ossidativi durante la conservazione mediante l'utilizzo di classici indicatori analitici di ossidazione. Le condizioni di conservazione applicate saranno le stesse suggerite dai produttori per i prodotti selezionati. Tuttavia, considerando che per alcuni prodotti la velocità di ossidazione è molto lenta, potranno essere applicati anche test di invecchiamento accelerato (ad esempio, temperatura di abuso a 35 °C per i prodotti stabili a temperatura ambiente o -12 °C per gli alimenti surgelati; esposizione alla luce simulando le condizioni di mercato).

▪ Fase 3: Monitoraggio dell'accettabilità dei prodotti selezionati tramite analisi sensoriale

L'obiettivo di questa fase è valutare l'accettabilità dei prodotti alimentari a diversi tempi di conservazione in base alla risposta di un campione di consumatori, utilizzando la metodologia denominata Survival Analysis. Ai consumatori verrà chiesto di valutare l'accettabilità dei prodotti alimentari selezionati aventi diversi tempi di conservazione. Per ogni test saranno coinvolti almeno 60 consumatori. Verrà loro proposto il prodotto in modo anonimo, ossia senza conoscerne la storia né il TMC. I consumatori dovranno esprimere un giudizio di accettabilità o inaccettabilità. I risultati binari ottenuti (accettabile/non accettabile) saranno elaborati mediante analisi statistica consentendo di ottenere una curva di rischio di inaccettabilità in funzione del tempo di conservazione dell'alimento.

Text in English:

The correct definition of the date marking is one of the possible interventions proposed to reduce food waste at household level. Although guidelines for date marking (i.e., use by date – UBD) of food at risk of safety issues during storage exist, no scientific-based indications are nowadays available for long-lasting foods, whose quality attributes progressively decrease during storage. These products compulsorily require the indication of the “best before date” (BBD) on the label. One of the main deterioration events expected during the storage of these products is lipid oxidation, which causes a quality decay easily perceivable by consumers and ending up in product rejection and ultimately in its wasting. The objective of the research activity here proposed is to develop a scientific-based approach for the identification of the BBD of food undergoing oxidation. This research activity is consistent with the research plan of the financed PRIN 2022 project “Fighting the waste of food undergoing oxidation through the development of a scientific-based approach for date marking”, within which the young scientist to be recruited will be involved.

The research plan considers the following steps:

▪ Phase 1: Identification of food products at high risk of oxidation during storage

This preliminary stage aims to identify, on rational basis, food categories at high risk of consumer rejection due to the development of oxidative reactions. To this purpose a risk assessment approach will be applied on food categories requiring the BBD as date marking, such as packed ambient stable (beverages, alcoholic drinks and fermented brews, bakery products, dried foods and ingredients, confectionary, cereals and snacks, oil and fats) and frozen (raw fish, meat or vegetables; ready to eat or heat products) foods. To this aim, the following procedure will be adopted: a) Identification of all the potential alternative events that may negatively impact the quality of a selected product; b) Risk rating for each alternative event potentially occurring during storage, considering the likelihood of the occurrence of the alternative event and taking into consideration food characteristics, processing and packaging. Results allow identifying food categories at high risk of oxidation.

▪ Phase 2: Monitoring oxidation reactions on the selected packed food products during storage

Among the food categories identified in step 1, a number of products will be selected as target foods to be considered to further research activity. The aim of this step will be studying the development of oxidation during storage of the selected products stored under ambient and frozen conditions by using conventional analytical indices of oxidation. The storage conditions applied will be the same of those considered by the producers for the selected products. However, considering that in some cases oxidation reactions are very slow, some tests under accelerated storage conditions (i.e., temperature of abuse at 35 °C for ambient stable products or -12 °C for frozen foods; light exposure simulating market conditions) will be also performed.

▪ Phase 3: Monitoring selected food acceptability by sensory analysis

The aim of this step is to assess food acceptability at different storage times based on consumer response by using survival analysis. Consumers will be asked to judge the acceptability of the selected food products having different storage times. At least 60 consumers will be involved each time by proposing the product in a blinded way, i.e., without knowing the product history and thus the BBD. Binary data (acceptable/unacceptable) will be further statistically elaborated by using survival analysis, a statistical procedure for data analysis for which the outcome variable of interest is time until an event occurs, commonly used in reliability analysis.
