Testo italiano:
L’obiettivo principale del programma di ricerca è trovare i migliori fattori di stabilità della resa di due leguminose da granella in Italia (favino e cece), come supporto di decision-making nell’azienda agricola e nella filiera. Per raggiungere questo obiettivo, sfrutteremo due diversi approcci che consentono una validazione incrociata dei dati nonché la possibilità di implementare automaticamente l’analisi dei dati al di fuori delle aree di sperimentazione e/o in un arco temporale diverso. Verranno adottati due approcci complementari: un approccio supportato da una rete di appezziamenti (field network) coltivati a leguminose da granella, con una sperimentazione di campo e il monitoraggio della rete di appezziamenti di aziende agricole e un approccio basato sul telerilevamento. Il primo approccio (field network) si basa su due fasi: 1) la creazione di una rete di agricoltori italiani (Centro-Nord Italia) che coltivano regolarmente queste colture e la selezione appezziamenti aventi diverse condizioni pedoclimatiche e di gestione delle colture. I dati rilevati saranno utilizzati come fonte primaria per un monitoraggio delle rese di queste colture e dei fattori condizionanti la resa; quindi 2) un’analisi retrospettiva dei dati di resa degli agricoltori in queste colture che consentirà di sviluppare un modello statistico volto a stimare la resa e la stabilità della resa in ciascun campo. Il secondo approccio (telerilevamento) sarà supportato dal field network. Qui, i dati misurati supporteranno un’analisi di immagini telerilevate (Sentinel 2) orientata sia a riconoscere queste leguminose da granella attraverso la loro firma spettrale sia a stimare adeguati indici di resa, oltre che stato idrico e nutrizionale. Infine, questi indici saranno validati in diversi intervalli di tempo sulla base di un’analisi retrospettiva. I principali risultati attesi dal programma di ricerca sono: 1) la designazione di fattori limitanti la resa in una leguminosa da granella italiana (fava o cece), 2) l’identificazione di indici per monitorare a distanza la resa GL insieme allo stato idrico e nutrizionale; 3) la progettazione di un modello statistico per individuare le aree più idonee alla resa e alla stabilità della resa delle leguminose da granella (fave o cece).
Text in English:
The research programme main objective is to find the best yield and yield stability drivers of two grain legumes commonly found in Italy, fava bean and chickpeas, as a support for on-farm and supply-chain decision-making. To reach this aim, we will exploit two different approaches allowing a cross validation of data as well as the possibility to automatically implement data analysis outside the pilot areas and/or in a different time span. Two approaches will be mobilised: a field network approach with a field trial and the monitoring of a field network and a remote sensing approach. The first approach (field network) is built on two steps: 1) the establishment of a network of Italian farmers regularly cultivating these crops and selection of 50 fields having different pedo-climatic and crop management conditions as primary source for a monitoring of yield and yield drivers; then 2) a retrospective yield data analysis that will allow to develop a statistical model aimed at estimating the yield and yield stability in each field. The second approach (remote sensing) will be supported by the field network. Here, the measured data will support an analysis of remote-sensed images (Sentinel 2) oriented both at recognizing these GL on their spectral signature and at estimating proper indexes of yield, water and nutritional status. Finally, we will validate these indexes in different time-span based on the performed retrospective analysis.
The main expected outcomes of the research project are: 1) the designation of yield limiting factors in an Italian grain legume (faba bean or chickpea), 2) the identification of indexes to remotely monitor GL yield along with water and nutritional status; 3) the design of a statistical model to identify the most suitable areas for grain legume (faba bean or chickpea) yield and yield stability.
