Testo in italiano:
Le strutture a guscio sono ampiamente utilizzate nella pratica ingegneristica grazie alla loro efficienza strutturale e versatilità. La caratteristica più interessante di questa classe di strutture è sicuramente la loro capacità di resistere a condizioni di carico severe limitando il peso complessivo. Come molti altri elementi strutturali ingegneristici, la stragrande maggioranza dei cedimenti del guscio sono causati da effetti di fatica, indotti dall’applicazione di carichi ripetuti nel tempo. È quindi evidente che una precisa valutazione e previsione della nucleazione e propagazione delle cricche da fatica nelle strutture a guscio è di fondamentale importanza per diverse ragioni: ridurre i cedimenti ed i costi associati; migliorare la sicurezza; razionalizzare lo sfruttamento delle risorse naturali e quindi migliorare aspetti relativi alla sostenibilità. Il presente progetto si propone di studiare, sviluppare e testare alcuni aspetti del metodo avanzato Phase-Field per la previsione degli stadi di nucleazione e propagazione delle cricche.

L’assegnista utilizzerà un codice FEM open source (ad esempio FEniCS) per l’implementazione e la simulazione dei processi di fratturazione. Saranno coinvolte anche attività sperimentali per validare i modelli sviluppati. Verranno considerati anche aspetti legati al Machine Learning, soprattutto se supportato da conoscenze analitiche (o semi-empiriche) di fenomeni fisici coinvolti.

Vista l’importanza della ricerca nel campo dell’integrità strutturale e l’interesse della comunità tecnico-scientifica, si prevede che i risultati ottenuti potranno essere pubblicati su importanti riviste scientifiche internazionali del settore. In aggiunta, questo progetto mira ad acquisire conoscenze e mezzi adeguati atti a soddisfare le esigenze delle aziende locali nell’ambito della progettazione ed il monitoraggio strutturale di organi e sistemi meccanici.
Text in English:
Shell structures are widely used in engineering practice due to their structural efficiency and versatility. The most attractive feature of this class of structures is certainly their capability to withstand severe loading conditions while limiting the overall weight. It is not by chance that shell structures are frequently found in nature as a result of the evolutionary self-optimisation process. Like many other engineering structural elements, the vast majority of shell failures are caused by fatigue effects, induced by the application of repeated loads over time. It is thus apparent that a precise evaluation and prediction of fatigue cracks nucleation and propagation in shell structures is of paramount importance for several reasons: to reduce failures and associated costs; to improve safety; to rationalise the exploitation of natural resources and thus sustainability. The present project aims at studying, developing and testing some aspects of the advanced Phase-Field method for the prediction of cracks nucleation and propagation stages.

The postdoctoral researcher will employ open-source FEM code (e.g., FEniCS) for implementation and simulation of fracturing processes. Experimental activities will be also involved to validate the developed models. Aspects related to Machine Learning will be also considered, especially when supported by physics knowledge.

Given the importance of this research in the field of structural integrity and the interest of the technical-scientific community, the results obtained are expected to be published in renowned international scientific journals. In addition, the project aims at establishing both a strong knowledge background and powerful tools, within the research group, to meet the needs of local industries in the field of structural design & monitoring of mechanical systems.
